Resolution 22/3 Cities and climate change

The Governing Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 63/221 of 19 December 2008 on the implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) and strengthening of the United Nations Human Settlements Programme, which, in paragraph 3, encourages Governments to promote the principles and practice of sustainable urbanization and strengthen the role and contribution of their respective local authorities in applying those principles and practice, in order to improve the living conditions of vulnerable urban populations, including slum-dwellers and the urban poor, and as a major contribution to mitigating the causes of climate change, adapting to the effects of climate change and reducing risks and vulnerabilities in a rapidly urbanizing world, including human settlements in fragile ecosystems, and invites the international donor community to support the efforts of developing countries in this regard,

Recalling also the Habitat Agenda and its twin goals of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world,

Recalling also the theme of the twenty-second session of the Governing Council, “Promoting affordable housing finance systems in an urbanizing world in the face of the global financial crisis and climate change” and the related theme paper,<sup>h</sup>

Taking note of the launch by the United Nations Human Settlements Programme of the Cities and Climate Change Initiative and the Oslo Statement on Cities and Climate Change of 17 March 2009,

Recognizing that climate change may have consequences for the attainment of the Millennium Development Goals and sustainable development, including negative impacts on housing, infrastructure, basic services and the quality of life in cities, and that the urban poor, especially vulnerable groups, including women, will be among those most affected by these impacts,

Recognizing also that cities are one of the major contributors of greenhouse gas emissions and that they have a key role to play in promoting energy efficiency, through more appropriate urban planning, management and building practices for sustainable urban development,

Recalling the medium-term strategic and institutional plan for the period 2008-2013,<sup>i</sup> which recognizes that urbanization, when poorly managed, can generate social exclusion and poverty and can result in uncontrolled urban sprawl, pollution and unsustainable consumption of land, water and other natural resources, which accelerate environmental degradation and the negative impacts of climate change,

Recognizing that efforts to enhance sustainable urbanization also offer opportunities to enhance climate change strategies, including mitigation and adaptation, through promoting participatory planning, management and governance; pro-poor land and housing; and environmentally sound basic infrastructure and services,

Recognizing the unique leading role of the fifteenth session of the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change in discussions aiming at a global climate change agreement in Copenhagen in 2009,

1. Requests the Executive Director to continue to increase awareness of the role of cities in addressing climate change, with particular emphasis on the impact of climate change on the urban poor and in achieving the Millennium Development Goals and sustainable development;

2. Encourages the Executive Director to develop in other regions such activities as the “Climate-resilient cities in Africa” initiative, as part of the Joint Partnership Framework established between the United Nations Human Settlements Programme and the United Nations Environment Programme;

3. Invites Governments to undertake further concerted and coordinated action to include the issue of cities and climate change as an integral part of their national climate change strategies, including mitigation and adaptation, in view of continuous urbanization and the fact that over half of humankind lives in urban areas and are particularly vulnerable to the effects of climate change;

4. Invites Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change at the fifteenth session of its Conference of the Parties in Copenhagen to take into account the crucial role of cities and towns in climate change strategies, including adaptation and mitigation;

5. Encourages the United Nations Human Settlements Programme, within its mandate, to continue the existing cooperation with the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change on issues of cities and climate change and to continue playing a complementary role in climate-change matters within the United Nations system;

6. Invites Governments and other relevant partners to support developing countries through the appropriate mechanism in each country to strengthen their capacities in promoting, among other things, pro-poor clean and affordable technological options, innovative approaches to urban planning and management and education and training on climate change strategies, as they pertain to sustainable urban development, while encouraging all other national and local authorities to strengthen their capacities in the manner set out above;

7. Invites Governments that are in a position to do so to provide technical and financial support to the Cities and Climate Change Initiative, to widen the geographical scope of the initiative and to expand the range of capacity-development approaches to support local authorities in addressing climate change;

8. Requests the Executive Director to include a discussion of the implementation of the present resolution in her overall progress report to the Council at its twenty-third session.

*7th plenary meeting
3 April 2009*

Resolution 22/4 Strengthening the development of urban young people

Recognizing that youth are key agents for sustainable human settlement development and a vital resource in attaining the development goals related to the United Nations Millennium Declaration,<sup>j</sup>

Recalling its commitment in paragraph 45 (e) of the Habitat Agenda<sup>k</sup> to the objective of working in partnership with youth in order to develop and enhance

Annex II

Statement by the President of the Governing Council on the effectiveness of the administrative arrangements at the United Nations Office at Nairobi

At the outset of the Governing Council, I received a document from the Government of Uganda that raised several issues about problems associated with the United Nations Office at Nairobi.

I took note of the sentiments and believe it is important to recognize the concerns expressed in the document. After consultation with several member States, however, I concluded that the concerns would be appropriately addressed by the General Assembly.

In the light of this I would like to call upon member States to support efforts during the sixty-fourth session of the General Assembly to improve the Nairobi duty station so that the United Nations Office at Nairobi can serve UN-Habitat in the most efficient way possible.

Annex III

Summaries by the President of the Governing Council of the high-level segment and of the dialogue on the special theme of the twenty-second session

I. High-level debate on agenda items 5-7

1. The Governing Council took up agenda items 5-7 at its 2nd plenary meeting, on Monday, 30 March 2009, which took the form of a high-level general debate on those agenda items. The general debate continued at the Council's 3rd and 4th plenary meetings, on Tuesday, 31 March 2009.

2. Much of the discussion focused on the two main dimensions of the special theme for the twenty-second session of the Governing Council — affordable housing finance in the context of the current global economic crisis, and the effects of climate change on financing affordable housing and infrastructure — and on the modalities by which UN-Habitat could best achieve progress in those areas.

3. With regard to the first of those issues, representatives stressed the multidimensional consequences of the global financial crisis, which had had negative impacts on the ability of all sections of society, particularly the poor, to upgrade their current housing status; on the budgetary priority that Governments were able to allocate to housing and other aspects of human settlements; and on the capacity of the financial, construction and other support sectors to engage in the housing sector. As many representatives remarked, the crisis had significantly slowed progress towards the attainment of internationally agreed development goals, including the Millennium Development Goals, related to human settlements. The concerns expressed covered a wide range of issues, including access to health and social services, gender equality, water supply and sanitation, education, governance, infrastructural development and quality of housing, all against the background of rapid urbanization.

4. Several representatives saw opportunities arising from those challenges, which could be a springboard for the development of innovative mechanisms to promote affordable housing. There was some discussion of the role of the State in that process, with a number of representatives speaking of the need for the public sector to facilitate the sustainable development of human settlements through supportive policy formulation and legislation, priority budget allocation, infrastructure development, and targeted subsidies for the poor. It was generally recognized, however, that the current financial crisis required innovative approaches that encouraged the involvement of all stakeholders, including international donors and agencies; private sector developers; financial and banking institutions; and non-governmental and community-based organizations. Most representatives gave examples of the specific measures being undertaken in their own countries to build partnerships in a manner appropriate to the national setting.

5. A recurring theme in the discussion was the difficulty of mobilizing finance at all levels, from national Governments wishing to undertake slum upgrading and infrastructure development, to poor people of low and irregular income wanting to upgrade or purchase housing. A range of solutions were discussed, including the creation of a stable political environment to encourage long-term funding, the inclusion of housing as a priority in poverty reduction strategies, setting up housing funds, complementary fiscal measures and a new legislative and regulatory framework to support microfinance and help the poor to gain access to credit and obtain mortgages. On the supply side, new technical solutions were needed to make it easier to build low-cost housing.

6. Some representatives stressed the need to strengthen governance structures, for example through institutional capacity-building; through efforts to combat corruption and enforce legislation and regulations related to land registration, tenancy and ownership; and through measures to make it easier for households to secure loans and carry out improvements to property. Several representatives also saw value in an approach that encouraged community involvement and empowerment through the promotion of self-help programmes. The gathering of country-level data related to housing and the monitoring and evaluation of those data were seen as vital in guiding policy development.

7. The continuing worldwide impact of climate change, added to the global financial crisis, the conflicts being experienced in many countries and the migration patterns accelerating the rate of urbanization meant that the international community was facing an unprecedented set of daunting challenges on a number of fronts. Several representatives drew attention to the vulnerability of cities to the effects of climate change and related natural phenomena, such as droughts, floods and storms. Other repercussions of climate change included falling agricultural production and consequent food shortages.

8. Several representatives suggested approaches that might assist in climate change adaptation and mitigation, including implementation of what were termed “green” housing projects, encouragement of energy saving in buildings, further research and development into climate change-resilient structures, and promotion of rural development to slow down migration to cities. One representative said that the principle of common but differentiated responsibility should continue to form the basis of international efforts to counter the impacts of climate change. Another representative praised UN-Habitat for the work carried out on climate change since the previous session of the Governing Council, as mandated in the Habitat Agenda, and expressed support for an approach that engaged cities in global networks.

9. The representative of a non-governmental organization spoke of the numerous problems facing women living in poverty at the grass-roots level, including rising food prices, unpredictable incomes, insecure housing tenure and having to provide for the health, education and welfare of their families in difficult circumstances. Nevertheless, those women had shown themselves to be experts in devising coping solutions, including by developing local funding mechanisms and organizing community-based action groups. It was therefore necessary for their voices to be heard and their experiences taken into account when decisions were taken at forums such as the Governing Council. Some representatives also highlighted the need for continued support for gender mainstreaming activities within the work of UN-Habitat.

10. Several representatives commended UN-Habitat on its good work, noting in particular its building of new partnerships with the private sector and identification of best practices, preparation of training materials, monitoring of key indicators and guidance to policymakers on housing and urban issues. It was noted that, with national budgets strained and the spending needs of UN-Habitat itself increasing, there was an urgent need to set clear priorities for future work. In that regard, the role of the medium-term strategic and institutional plan was stressed as a framework for future work and its results framework was seen as a valuable monitoring and evaluation tool. Coordinated service delivery in line with the “Delivering as one” approach was commended by several representatives.

11. There was a call for increased funding and for Governments to honour existing funding pledges to UN-Habitat, given that the vital role played by the organization required predictable funding and support. Better planning, improved access to finance and concentration on the needs of the most vulnerable must guide UN-Habitat work. It was also suggested that recommendations made by the United Nations Board of Auditors in relation to identified management weaknesses and areas of risk should be tackled promptly and thoroughly to ensure that the organization maintained the highest standards of transparency and accountability.

12. Several representatives commented on the value of the World Urban Forum as a forum for global discussion on issues relating to the challenges presented by urbanization and as a mechanism for sharing best practice and current thinking. In addition, the representative of the African Ministerial Conference on Housing and Urban Development reported on that organization’s Abuja conference of July 2008, the main outcome of which, the Abuja Resolution, was of great relevance to the work of UN-Habitat in Africa. The representative pledged that the Conference would continue to work with UN-Habitat, the Cities Alliance and other key stakeholders, and requested additional funding and support from the international community.

13. Most representatives expressed the strong support of their Governments for the work of UN-Habitat and several gave specific commitments regarding funding. The United States of America and the Republic of Korea both announced a doubling of support to UN-Habitat core funding to reflect the importance of the UN-Habitat global mandate and progress in achieving strategic and institutional changes. Kenya announced an increase in its contribution from $60,000 to $70,000 for the next three years, while Japan detailed the technical cooperation, reconstruction assistance, peacebuilding and humanitarian use to which its $18 million had been put over the past three years, together with a recent $4 million contribution to disaster recovery in Myanmar. Zimbabwe said that it planned to resume regular contributions to UN-Habitat as soon as the Zimbabwean economy was back on track, and Cuba expressed its readiness to share its experiences on human settlements achievements in a range of sectors, including vulnerability reduction and disaster mitigation.

II. Dialogue on the special theme

14. At its 5th and 6th plenary meetings, on Wednesday, 1 April 2009, the Council held a dialogue on the special theme for the session under agenda item 6. The dialogue was divided into two panels, each with a moderator, and chaired by the President of the Governing Council.

A. Panel 1: affordable housing finance in the context of the current global economic crisis

Introduction

15. Introducing the panel, the moderator, Ms. Irene Vance, Consultative Group to Assist the Poor, drew attention to the key questions to be borne in mind by the panellists, as contained in document HSP/GC/22/4. She pointed out that community savings schemes formed a point of departure to enable the poor to take the first steps on to the housing ladder and were particularly important in the context of the current global financial crisis. There was no single solution to the question of affordable housing and financing mechanisms varied extensively according to local circumstances, she said, adding that it was important to find ways to ensure transparency and accountability. She suggested that, in the wake of the regulatory shortcomings that had emerged in the formal market, it might be time to look afresh at standards and practices and at ways of re-establishing the confidence that had been lost following the credit crisis. In that regard, she stressed the importance of including all key stakeholders in the housing chain. She suggested that the establishment of a global network to share knowledge and information on mechanisms for affordable housing finance and infrastructure could be useful and wondered whether UN-Habitat could provide some input. She pointed out that, while the current recession was one of the deepest faced by the developed world in recent years, the less developed countries had experienced a series of financial crises from which positive lessons could be learned, given that the world was interconnected at the economic level.

16. The panel discussion was held in two parts and the discussions are reflected in sections A and B below, accordingly.

1. First part

(a) Presentations

17. Mr. Dan Ericsson, State Secretary to the Minister for Local Government and Financial Markets of Sweden, pointed out how the global financial crisis had affected every sector of every country and industry. The full effects of the crisis were still to be felt and, in the light of spiralling unemployment and poverty, Governments would increase public spending and investment with the ensuing prospect of global inflation. He emphasized that UN-Habitat was not primarily concerned with the problems afflicting the financial markets in the developed world, but with the effects that the crisis would have on the poor. It was crucial to make housing in developing countries attractive to the global investment market, but, for that to happen, housing must be based on an infrastructure of rights, where the concepts of trust and transparency were paramount. In that regard, he pointed to the need for stable legislation and the establishment of a transparent and accurate titles register, while recognizing that there was controversy as to the need for such a register. He concluded by expressing the hope that the global financial sector would realize that investment in the poorest areas could form the basis for the future growth of the global economy.

18. Mr. Joko Widodo, Mayor of Surakarta, Indonesia, spoke of the initiatives being taken in his city in response to the challenges of increasing urbanization, expanding slum areas and inadequate public facilities. Those initiatives included the creation of a new marketplace for street vendors, the implementation of a project to upgrade substandard houses, the use of underused land in city centre slum areas to provide affordable housing, the conversion of riverbank settlements to urban forest and public parks and the upgrading of the public sanitation system in accordance with national environment standards. Slum upgrading was financed through national subsidy and cross-subsidy between residential and commercial development. Sanitation infrastructure was financed by sharing costs between the community, municipality and national budget.

19. Mr. Muchadeyi Ashton Masunda, Mayor of Harare, pointed out that the current global financial crisis had negative implications for the provision of public funds for low-income housing. Solutions had to be found to finance cities on a sustainable basis, he said, and he proposed that 20 per cent of development aid should be channelled to local government structures and extensively used to provide affordable housing for their citizens. Noting the problem posed by the requirement for collateral for loans to local authorities, he pointed out that in more mature democracies the sovereign guarantee of Governments was usually sufficient. It was also important to look at the quality of the loans to ensure that they were provided over a sustained period at competitive interest rates. He stressed the importance of adopting a flexible and pragmatic approach and welcoming all possible partners to help in the task of meeting the needs of those citizens who could not afford to go to the traditional markets for housing finance. In that context, he described the model used in Harare for the provision of affordable housing, whereby local authorities provided the land, building societies provided the mortgage finance and multilateral organizations provided the hard currency. The employer of the house purchaser had to give an assurance to the building society that the employee's wages would be paid. He admitted that, while that model had enabled the building of a number of housing estates in the Harare suburbs, too few of those consisted of high-density housing.

20. Mr. Peter Makau, Equity Bank, Kenya, gave an outline of the history and operation of the bank, explaining that it aimed to promote access to finance for poorer people. He stressed that the financial crisis was in no way a reflection of the ability of poorer people to sustain loans, explaining that the bank's customers had an extremely high repayment rate for loans and, generally, the default rate for that sector was significantly lower than for the conventional lending. Climate change and the need to adapt housing models, he said, underlined the need for affordable housing, especially as consumer power was eroded by the rising prices of essential goods. He said that environmental stresses led to expanding slums and a worsening quality of life and that national policies were needed within private and public partnerships to ensure affordable housing and other benefits for the urban poor. In conclusion, he expressed his bank's commitment to developing affordable products and said that the bank was working to identify partners, including those in the construction industry.

(b) Discussion

21. In the ensuing discussion, one representative said that better management of growing cities was needed to attract investment. Mapping of urban areas was a basic requirement for improved planning and for land registration, which underlay security of tenure, and many cities in the developing world required capacity-building in that area. Another representative said, with regard to the land administration chain, that it would be useful to identify good practices to illustrate the institutional arrangements that assisted in streamlining delivery of land, enabling earlier development of housing. Mr. Ericsson responded that many examples existed worldwide and gave a recent example from his own experience in Huruma, Nairobi, based on small savings and community action.

22. Some speakers gave examples of the policies introduced in their countries in response to the global financial crisis. One representative stressed the importance of the rental market for housing, and outlined the initiative in his country to build environmentally friendly, State-subsidized housing units suitable for rental to low-income households. Another representative said that his country had introduced a number of measures to stimulate the housing market, including subsidies for lower-income families, reduced interest rates, fiscal concessions and special funds. A third representative spoke of the difficulty of securing loans on the international finance market when a number of major financial institutions were wary of accepting the sovereign guarantee of the State as a surety. The representative added that a greater problem was that even once a loan was secured, housing remained too expensive for most of the population. She asked all panellists whether they had any solution to make housing cheaper, potentially by using new technologies.

23. Responding to some of the issues raised, Mr. Masunda agreed that proper planning was vital to urban growth. Waiting lists needed to be rigorously maintained and formed an important basis for decision-making on the types of housing development to be undertaken, whether low, medium or high-density, and whether leasehold or freehold. The State, as the lender of last resort, could act as a guarantor of mortgage bonds, but such a resort was not usually necessary if development schemes were properly planned and implemented. Lastly, he said that evidence contradicted the popular perception that the informal sector was too risky to lend to, and repayment rates were often better than those achieved in the formal sector.

24. In response to a question on the cost of housing, Mr. Makau said that, even in instances in which finance was available for low-cost housing, the cost of the final product often remained a difficulty. The solution lay in pursuing technological and material solutions that brought the cost of housing down to levels that were accessible to low-income groups.

2. Second part

(a) Presentations

25. Mr. Relu Fenechiu, Global Parliamentarians for Habitat, spoke of the four trends that would negatively affect developing countries: declining export levels; a possible decline in development aid; falling remittances; and a decline in foreign direct investment. Predicting that there would be less public money available for housing and infrastructure and less capacity from businesses and individuals to invest in affordable housing, he stressed that it was therefore all the more important to establish active partnerships between central and local governments and the private housing sector. Among the measures suggested were the promotion of alternatives to private mortgage-based housing schemes, new financial mechanisms, the mobilization of private domestic resources and the development of sound policy frameworks, all within a context of regulation of the banking sector and increased transparency with regard to risk. In conclusion, he said that housing and related infrastructure development would remain engines for economic growth, investments in the sector would have high multiplier effects in developing countries and advances in affordable housing would also be key in attaining the Millennium Development Goals.

26. Ms. Ayanthi Gurusinghe, Emerging Markets Group, focused on women's access to affordable housing finance systems, examining the disparities in the treatment of men and women in the sector, the rationale behind the drive to improve women's rights, the barriers facing women and the importance of housing finance. She outlined strategies to ensure that housing finance reached low-income settlements, such as the development of various community-based self-finance and savings initiatives, and, in particular, ways of developing women's access to finance. In conclusion, she considered such issues as land ownership, joint land registration for married couples, security of tenure, the exercise of traditional responsibilities in a scenario of increasing urbanization, the development of well-focused housing development policy and the situation in Sri Lanka with regard to those issues.

27. Ms. Kecia Rust, FinMark Trust, took up the issue of the opportunities and challenges of microfinance in Africa, noting that, notwithstanding the financial crisis, many countries in Africa had registered growth in their financial sectors and that the market for microfinance was potentially enormous, particularly in the area of small-scale loans for housing improvements, such as piecemeal enlargements of dwellings one room at a time. She commented on the findings of a recent workshop organized by her organization, Rooftops Canada and Habitat for Humanity International in Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, in May 2008 and the suggested interventions put forward in areas such as government policy at the national and local levels, housing support services and the need for increased commercialization of microfinance lenders to attract investors. She concluded by summarizing the key impacts of the financial crisis at the various levels.

(b) Discussion

28. In the ensuing discussion, one representative said that in his country the stabilization of population growth had led to a shift in policy from ensuring an adequate quantity of housing to a concentration on good-quality housing that would endure, with parallel changes in the structuring of the finance market. In response to the global financial crisis, measures were being undertaken to assist those encountering credit difficulties following job loss.

29. The representative of a regional economic integration organization outlined some housing actions that could be taken at the regional level. Under the European economic recovery plan, adopted at the end of 2008, the energy efficiency of buildings had been accorded high priority, and finance was available from the European Development Fund to help in realizing the considerable advantages to the environment and to social cohesion that could derive from refurbishment of existing residential buildings.

30. Several speakers stressed the importance of grass-roots action, and a number of examples were given of provision of housing through community-level action by groups that were often marginalized, including women. The examples given illustrated the range of possibilities for finance, from a revolving loan fund that helped women in a local community to buy land and to improve their quality of life, to an international urban poor fund leveraging finance from multilateral donors.

Those who spoke urged decision makers and policymakers to listen more intently to the voices of those whom they were trying to help.

31. With regard to low-cost housing, one representative said that in his country efforts to encourage the private sector to develop innovative building materials that were cheaper than conventional materials had proved unsuccessful. Another representative said that in his country a cess had been imposed on buildings of over 500 square metres, the proceeds of which went into a fund that was used to finance housing for the very poor. Lastly, a third representative urged that the goal of sustainability, based on the concept of ownership, should be kept in mind in any proposed solutions.

3. Closing remarks

32. In her closing remarks, the moderator said that before the current economic crisis the issue of housing had fallen in priority compared to other issues, such as health and education. The potential of housing to act as an agent of economic growth and social recovery had, however, returned it to the forefront of the agenda, and Governments had responded by devising a range of measures aimed at facilitating the development of affordable housing. While many financing institutions remained tentative, donors had a key role to play in providing seed capital to meet the demand for funds that still existed among grass-roots organizations and people of low income.

33. Good practices already existed, and microfinance had been shown to offer an appropriate mechanism for meeting the needs of those with small amounts of savings. Microfinance systems had often proved more stable and had exhibited higher repayment rates than more formal systems. As the global economic crisis continued, it was likely that the demand for microfinance would grow, and there was an urgent need to build further robust financing instruments at all levels. Innovative solutions were needed, including constructing new value chains that linked partners in unconventional ways. In conclusion, she said that the easier part was perhaps finance; more difficult was the delivery of affordable housing that was dignified and decent.

B. Panel 2: effects of climate change on financing affordable housing and infrastructure

Introduction

34. The moderator, Ms. Christine Platt, President, Commonwealth Association of Planners, introduced the topic of the effects of climate change on the provision of affordable housing and infrastructure finance, as contained in document HSP/GC/22/4. She drew attention to the medium-term strategic and institutional plan as a response to the many challenges faced by UN-Habitat, and noted that the plan's focus areas 2-4 offered opportunities to enhance climate change mitigation and adaptation. She also highlighted the participative and partnership nature of the relationship between the many bodies represented at the current session and, in general, in UN-Habitat, and said that the outcome of the dialogues would indicate follow-up actions for national and local governments and for UN-Habitat itself.

35. The panel was held in two parts and the discussions are reflected in sections A and B below, accordingly.

1. First part

(a) Presentations

(i) Introductory presentation by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change

36. Mr. Andrew Githeko, Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, gave an overview of the Panel's work, explaining that it was a United Nations body that assessed scientific, technical, social and economic information relevant to the understanding of human-induced climate change and that it reported every five years. Summarizing the latest data and trends, he explained that there had been perceptible warming and climate change since the 1970s of around 0.2 degrees Celsius per decade, but that the variability of that increase rendered extreme climate events such as flooding, drought, sea-level rise and heat waves more frequent and unpredictable. Thus, several areas of central Kenya that had previously been malaria free were currently malarial owing to rising temperatures, making climate change an issue of health alongside housing. He suggested that building standards should be changed along with those of storm and drainage systems, and that consideration should be given to avoiding new developments in flood-prone and coastal areas.

(ii) Presentations by panellists

37. Mr. Mohammad Yousaf Pashtun, Minister of Urban Development, Afghanistan, summarized the causes of the global financial crisis, pointing out that it was credit rather than cash that was in short supply, and that microcredit processes in developing countries were generally operating satisfactorily. He further pointed out that, while climate change might make housing finance more expensive for medium-cost and high-cost housing, that was not necessarily so for low-cost housing, which used local, natural and traditional materials that were often cheaper and more environmentally sustainable than modern alternatives. He suggested that a public information campaign was needed to spread that message and to publicize the benefits of traditional low-cost construction, with environmentally friendly building techniques promoted and protected by international bodies, including UN-Habitat and the United Nations Environment Programme. Young people, as vocal and enthusiastic environmental campaigners, should especially be targeted.

38. Mr. Adam Kimbisa, Mayor of Dar es Salaam, said that it was difficult to separate causes and symptoms in a multifaceted crisis, but that there was no doubt that the poor would suffer. Developing countries had made little contribution to climate change compared to developed nations, but consequences such as migration to cities from rural areas rendered unproductive by climate change and the consequent challenges of rapid and uncontrolled urban growth, transport, infrastructure, health, education and inadequate housing were being borne by Africa. He acknowledged that developing countries were also contributing to climate change and must be aware of that and endeavour to reduce their impact. He called for universal and international action to aid mitigation and adaptation on climate change, adding that investment in that area, particularly in poor countries, must not be compromised by the global financial crisis.

39. Mr. Jorge Bittar, Housing Secretary of Rio de Janeiro, said that 20 per cent of that city's population lived in informal settlements in poor and insanitary housing, and that there was a 350,000-unit housing deficit in the city. With urban planning and social housing the administration's main priority, efforts were being directed at slum upgrading and the construction of large-scale low-income housing. The city's administration was planning to develop existing vacant urban land, he reported, taking advantage of the existence of services and infrastructure, and 100,000 housing units were planned over the next four years, using innovative construction and financing initiatives. Those programmes included water heating systems based on solar energy, refuse and sewage collection and treatment, rainwater recycling, reforestation and the creation of parks in informal settlements. The city was exploring the possibility of raising funds from the carbon market to finance partially those investments. He stressed that housing was a cause of the current economic crisis, but also a good response to it, offering jobs, investment and economic growth.

(b) Discussion

40. In the ensuing discussion, two representatives raised issues concerning the experience, skills and expertise of women, particularly at the grass-roots level, arguing that such women were a significant and untapped resource in the quest for creative and workable solutions to the multiple challenges of housing in the context of climate change and the current financial crisis, and also that their contribution was insufficiently acknowledged. All three panellists responded by acknowledging women's position as strongly affected by issues of climate change and stressed the need to involve them in decision-making processes and to seek to provide them with productive, income-generating activities.

41. One representative described his country's aim to be carbon-neutral by 2013 and described the comprehensive and far-reaching nature of partnership and cooperation between the State, cities and stakeholders, which would ensure that appropriate planning and development decisions were taken, and that existing urban settlements could be brought into line. He urged the creation of green jobs for young people in renewable energy and transportation, among other areas, and stated his belief that, while cities were the source and victims of many problems, they were also the greatest hope for the future. All the panellists expressed support for the country's aims in that regard and requested a forum or network to be established whereby the key learning points and best practices could be shared by other cities and authorities worldwide.

42. One representative raised the issue of the increasing and perhaps inevitable horizontal urban sprawl in the absence of technologies that rendered it possible to build vertically using affordable and sustainable materials, and the loss of productive land and infrastructure challenges that such spread would entail. His concern that consideration should be given to how such horizontal sprawl should be managed so as not to disadvantage further the poor met with varied responses from the panel. Mr. Pashtun pointed out that, although low-rise housing was more costly and environmentally unfriendly than its high-rise counterpart, there was cultural resistance to high-rise living in some parts of the world that would take time to overcome. He added, however, that the social, economic and environmental costs of horizontal sprawl were unsustainable and could take no long-term place in urban planning. Mr. Kimbisa said that a lack of pressure on land, unlike in Singapore, for example, combined with a lack of technical expertise, made high-rise development less likely in Dar es Salaam. Mr. Bittar agreed that capacity and technologies were often lacking in developing countries and stressed the need for a strong and far-reaching international network to share best practices and experiences from industrialized countries.

43. One representative spoke of his country's regulations and restrictions pertaining to development in coastal areas and raised the issue of the affordability of land, even in the absence of climate change. Mr. Kimbisa agreed that the cost of city-centre land was an obstacle to low-cost housing.

44. The representative of the Executive Director expressed his strong support for an appeal made by one representative for partnerships that would expand the Cities in Climate Change initiative pilot project. He indicated that there were plans to expand the initiative in Africa, the Pacific and the Caribbean.

(a) Presentations

45. Mr. Jimnah Mbaru, First National Vice-Chairman of the Kenya National Chamber of Commerce and Industry, looked at the theme of the session from a private sector perspective, giving examples of the role that Governments and institutions played in financing. He began by illustrating the effects of climate change and the global financial crisis on the availability of funding for housing with the example of Kenya, where the current drought and resulting high food prices, together with lower levels of remittances received from Kenyans abroad, meant that less money was available for spending on housing. The population shift from rural to urban areas was simultaneously creating a housing crisis in cities. Institutions had a significant role to play in rapidly growing cities: developing countries should replicate the institutional frameworks that had been successful in developed countries with government financial agencies and the private sector providing affordable funding for housing. The cost of land in urban areas meant that affordable housing expansion was in areas further from city centres and Governments needed to finance infrastructure in those areas. Housing design and building materials also had important financial considerations. Governments had a vital role in financing availability in developing countries; they needed to look at reforms and innovative instruments for housing financing, for example through infrastructure bonds and the creation of a secondary mortgage market. Private sector partners should use the opportunity to develop the affordable housing market.

46. Ms. Louise Cox, President, International Union of Architects, referred to the Habitat Professionals Forum meeting in March 2009 and the recommendations made on the importance of partnerships between human settlements professionals, Governments, UN-Habitat and other partners in promoting a global campaign for sustainable urban development. She called for urgent action to regenerate communities and the environment and stressed the importance of empowering communities and encouraging local debate. It was also important to look at lessons learned from disaster relief in innovative building techniques and sustainable solutions. She emphasized the importance of using sustainable materials, rehabilitating existing building stock, preserving social systems and communities, upgrading infrastructure and using renewable energy sources. The involvement of the private sector in small projects offered benefits for all.

47. Ms. Maria Valencia, Youth Advisory Board, expressed appreciation for the efforts of UN-Habitat to engage young people in finding solutions to housing and environmental challenges through the Board. She referred to the UN-Habitat publication relating to the state of the world's cities that highlighted the problems of unemployment among young people and the risks faced by young urban slum-dwellers as a result of climate change. Giving examples of projects driven by young people in various countries, she said that the current financial crisis should not be permitted to affect adversely initiatives led by young people; rather investment in those should be increased. With the high rate of unemployment among young people, training and employment opportunities had to be created, for example in environmental activities, financial management and renewable energy. She called for UN-Habitat, Governments and organizations to consider young people as partners, to involve them in consultations and to act urgently to mobilize them in seeking solutions to the current crises.

(b) Discussion

48. In the ensuing discussion, a number of representatives welcomed the comments on young people and said that their input was vital. One representative said that the involvement of young people in UN-Habitat youth-led projects demonstrated their leadership, innovative and practical abilities. Young people needed to be challenged and should be given support, for example, through the Opportunities Fund for Youth-Led Development. He also drew attention to the importance of involving marginalized and aboriginal communities and the lessons that could be learned from them. One representative urged the use of arts and culture as a way of engaging and educating young people and urged UN-Habitat, Governments and municipalities to involve young people in decision-making at all levels. Another representative proposed the creation of resource zones for women in communities, for example, the provision of community kitchens and services; women should be part of sustainable development and small projects.

49. One representative drew attention to the importance of safety and meeting acceptable building specifications in the provision of affordable housing. Another noted the need for global standards in that regard, such as those being proposed by the Government of Qatar.

50. One representative emphasized the importance of a coordinated approach to the three crises of housing, finance and climate change; partnerships were crucial and Governments should work with UN-Habitat and involve professionals.

51. Responding to the points raised, the panellists endorsed the importance of involving women and young people. Ms. Cox said that it was important to involve not only women, but also families and communities. She agreed that environmental and building standards had to be enforced and supported the involvement of indigenous people and the use of traditional methods of sustainable building. Mr. Mbaru regretted the lack of interest in the private sector in building standards, but said that there would be no market if costs were too high. Mr. Bittar said that urban drift was a continuing trend and presented opportunities and challenges to find better ways of controlling the process; Governments had failed to understand the problems facing cities and to find solutions and it was therefore essential for all sectors of society to work together. Mr. Kimbisa endorsed the need to involve young people, stressing that they were current and future leaders.

3. Closing remarks

52. In her closing remarks the moderator said that the issues were far from simple and time was running out. Immediate action was required and the global financial crisis was no excuse for inaction on climate change. A global response was called for, involving partnerships with United Nations agencies, global networks, cities, professionals, civil society, young people, women and indigenous people. She emphasized the need for more public information and increased awareness among young people and women, which could be achieved by using new tools such as the Internet and through arts, culture and sport. She also emphasized the need for greater investment in infrastructure and in research on new technologies and their application. She pointed out that housing was part of the solution to the climate change crisis. There was general consensus on the crucial role of cities in the mitigation of climate change and the consequential need for Governments to put cities at the centre of action and strategies to deal with climate change. All key partner groups needed to have the ability to tackle the urban climate change challenge.
